Autism is often misunderstood as something easily recognizable through outward behaviors, yet it is not defined by these traits alone. It originates from how the brain is uniquely wired and how individuals process the world around them. In many cases, autism presents in subtle ways, especially in adults who may not have been diagnosed as children. Despite an increased understanding of autism, many individuals, especially girls, are still overlooked or misinterpreted. This talk will explore how autism can manifest in ways that are easy to miss, how individuals may have struggled with these differences throughout their lives, and the profound impact of an autism diagnosis later in life. Attendees will gain insight into how these experiences shape self-understanding and how receiving a diagnosis can provide clarity, validation, and opportunities for self-advocacy.
